

HOW YOU CAN TAKE ACTION

The anti-rights movement is growing in Australia. Emboldened by wins in other parts of the world, they have been slowly attacking hard-won progress towards gender and reproductive justice and causing real harm to the most vulnerable among us.

Feeling angry about everything you've just found out?
It's time to channel that energy into action.

Here's your guide to drowning out the hate and organising for hope...

1/ GET INFORMED

Knowledge is power and understanding how these actors work is the first step to countering them. Luckily, you've already got a head start on this one.

But you don't have to stop here. Over the next few weeks, make sure to set aside some time to check out the work of the incredible people and organisations in our Resistance Reading List to keep learning about the anti-rights groups and how to effectively counter them.

2/ BE READY TO STEP UP AND STAND IN SOLIDARITY WHEN YOUR VOICE IS NEEDED

It's in the interest of the anti-rights movement to make us think we're alone in wanting a future grounded in respect, dignity, care and equality. From these factsheets, you now know that these groups are intentionally spreading mis- and dis-information, manufacturing moral panics and exploiting people's lack of familiarity with the trans community or things like comprehensive sexuality education to spread hate and division.

But not everyone in your family or community might. That's why one of the most important things you can do is talk to the people around you and help them cut through the deliberate noise to understand what's happening around us.

We know that it can sometimes be hard to find the rights words to talk about issues like these, but speaking up and showing at this particular moment in time is a lot more important being perfect. And luckily, a lot of really smart people have already done the work to also help you find the words you need to have these conversations effectively. Here are just a few places to get you started:

- Conversations for Trans Justice: A guide for trans people, our loved ones, and allies, from the Trans Justice Project
- Be an Ally – Support Trans Equality, from the Human Rights Campaign
- The Abortion Language Guide, from MSI
- How to Talk About Abortion, from Doctors Without Borders
- How to challenge crappy language when you hear it, from Minus18

Showing up also means learning about the organisations doing this work day in, day out and supporting their actions when they need it the most. Here are two actions you can take right now to stand in solidarity with the trans community in Australia:

- Add your name to this statement of solidarity with the trans community
- Make your support for a real plan for trans health care known

3/ SUPPORT FEMINIST MOVEMENTS

Feminist and social justice movements have always been powerful drivers for transformative change across the world. Their work challenges power, questions the norms and beliefs that limit us and tackle the root causes of inequality, all so we can all lead full, meaningful lives on our own terms. For years they have been sounding the alarm, acting as our frontline in resisting anti-rights movements and pushing back against their efforts to block our basic rights and freedoms.

But right now, they're not being resourced in the way they need to be.

In countries across the world, we're seeing funding for gender equality be slashed at the exact time when this work is most needed. Organisations on the ground have been doing their best to weather this storm and stretch already-limited resources as far as they can to mount a defence to this deliberate, strategic attack on our rights. But truly responding to this movement requires more.

Feminist movements need real funding. The kind that allows them to invest in monitoring and exposing the work of anti-rights actors. To counter mis- and dis-information and explore ways to tell our stories more powerfully and creatively in order to shift public narratives about our rights. To set aside time for meaningful collaboration, sharing and connection. The kind of funding that sees this work not only as a nice to have, but as essential in moving us beyond simply responding this moment towards boldly building the future we all deserve.
